Yes, but I still think it would be a step back - mainly with regards to speed and other features/possibilities. (But there is another project being converted to classics.)

Moreover I think the majority of the classic users (especially those with graphics cards) are experienced users actually and therefore I assume they've already built their own system themselves, you know, while AmiKit on WinUAE is of great benefit for newcomers. The experienced classic users can always rip off the AmiKit and use the things they particularly need.

In addition, I do not own the "classic" HW anymore. I would like to focus on OS4 instead.
