Because those that invest their money in these projects deserve respect.

You mean the paying customers, deserve respect?

What he means is that there are people who putting money into the "development" of products...those deserve to be left unknown (if they ask to be so) and given the sole right to decide whether a product will be shipped, if, and when Again, those that invest their money in the projects get to choose when/if things are released. Not you. Not me.

How does that work? What is the process how does the beta testers management and developers find out when to release the software?

Once the product has reached a state the developers and betatesters agree is fit for release.
It will be given to the one that paid for it's development in the first place (no, not the customers) and let him or her decide...

That is from a POV of a user who neither know whats really going on behind the curtains nor knows anyone of those who pay (maybe Trevor, but i don't know him personally either) 😞

It's called common sense
