@Billsey

I don't want to take sides in all this, I just find it really really sad. However, I do remember Amiga Inc setting up the deal with Hyperion with a view that if they went broke then the OS would be in good hands. That was made public. I have said it before and I will say it again, on a moral basis if Amiga Washington can avoid their debts by becoming insolvent then they should not be able to transfer their assets elsewhere. Of course my views do not represent a legal position, just one of common decency. If Amiga Inc lose their IP due to creating shell companies to avoid debt whilst forgetting to transfer assets strictly by the law, so be it.

All the end user wants is an Amiga OS, I don't really care if blind Freddy owns the IP so long as there is a product. I hazard to say Amiga Inc HAVE stopped that product being realised since they handed it over to Hyperion.
