Probably they think that there will be no os4 updates released in the public anymore, so they try to pretend as successors. But that plain bad even if take that into account. Who they are, to name system components the same name, and more of it, using the same theme in versioning, to create a mess for everyone?

I mean what the problem to be creative and tactful to say at least, and call them "eformat", "eclock", "etime", just like you say. And use their own versioning schemes like v1.xx or something. But they use 53.x! Just like system ones and overwrite their components!

Even if take into account there will be no anymore any os4 updates, it still was bad and smells bad. And everyone in the beta team of the Enhancer says to Matthew it is wrong and bad. For me, it smells even a little bit rotten. Like you steal the original name, original version, and some other authors (who know how good they are) overwrite system components.

The bad thing is that does not matter what Matthew will continue that mess-fest with system components :)
