It's all easier than sounds. All the questions you post on StackOverflow already have answers. By anyone who was involved in the WebKit based browsers. You may just ask here about :) Or ask JadaCaps, he pretty open to explain what and how he does.

All you need is a skilled and motivated developer. It should be of course non-amiga developer, but then, you should motivate him. Without any bounties, without any other amiga-stuff. Just you and him.

I am sure for 10-25 thousand someone can take such a huge job, like, developers from the PPC-world of Linux.

There no needs to be any objective-C or whatever as JadaCaps go with Wayfarer (it's just his own wish to use ObjectC, nothing which makes it necessary). The whole WebKit is still c/c++.

All is about found out developers outside of the amiga community, deal with him, land him machine (and be sure he will not be the one "that and that didn't works, it's shit", but one who can deal with issues for sake of work, etc).

And to control it all, it should be someone with good knowledge. Not like throwing money out the window, because one will promise a shit of stuff :)
