Ah yes, the dismount command - forgot about that one. Good point.

But I would at least try first without the FORCE.

From "help dismount":

---8<---

FORCE

Attempt to remove the file system device data from memory even if the file system itself is unwilling to go. This is a potentially dangerous option and should be used only as a last resort when everything else has failed. Note that this option may not succeed in cleaning up all the resources the file system may still be using.

---8<---

If you haven't used the volume at all - because you're doing it right from the startup - I would expect it to dismount willingly, which is probably a safer situation.

BTW, the old, unsafe dismount option was removed from assign because the safer and better current functionality was created as a separate command.

This also makes more sense logically (what does dismounting have to do with assigns?).

Best regards,

Niels
