Because it is very slow

Got any proof of that? My understanding is that it is nearly as fast as JXFS, and of course much faster than FFS. Perhaps there is some specialised situations where it performs badly, but it seems great in general usage here.

And even if it does perform a bit worse than JXFS, I prefer stability & reliability over raw speed, since I highly value my data. I think JXFS still has a little way to go yet, or I might be using it myself.

and does not take advantage of the new dos.library features which JXFS does use.

And do these new features do anything of real importance for JXFS? I am curious. Anyway, I am sure that SFS could be updated to use them if they are really that great.
