Java applications does not need to be ported between platforms.

Theoretically true but I bet even with full support for the various GUI related class some work will need to be done to fix amiga paths. Even if java has a filepath abstraction API I'd lay good odds that many coders don;t use it and stick a ./ and ../ in here and there.

Focusing on the 'apps for free' aspect of this kind of project will always end up in some degree of disappointment. Rather I think the benefit is an additional powerful programing language with extensive support libraries becomes available to us. (much as python and perl).
